

It has come to my attention that a broadcast service is being considered for expansion by the FCC, called Low Power FM (LPFM). If so, then it seems that FM translator services may lose priority and not be able to provide their services to the community. This is something that greatly concerns me.

I am writing on behalf of K-LOVE radio. I began listening to this station about 2.5 years ago after returning to the United States from a year spent abroad in Japan. My time spent in Japan was fantastic, except it is hard to stay focused and live out my faith as a disciple of Jesus Christ in a country that is largely Buddhist. K-Love radio was a refreshing change to come home to because it provides upbeat Christian music, insights into Godly living, and how to build your family up. With its ability to be broadcast over the internet as well as serving the local community on the radio, I would estimate that I spend 75% of my radio listening time tuned into K-Love.

If this station were to be removed or replaced by LPFM, I believe that it would be a severe injustice to the people here in Denver and the surrounding communities. There are several families with young children who listen to K-Love because it provides a family-friendly environment. Unlike other stations, where the listener must be wary of the "gutter-talk" that everyone wants to protect their children from.

I hope that you will carefully consider the impact that will be felt by replacing national or regional broadcasts like K-Love with LPFM.
